Is remote reasonable? - A former Morgan, Lewis & Bockius staff member sued the global law firm last week alleging that management refused her request to work from home after she suffered a stroke, despite mandating remote work for all employees a few months later during the pandemic. The lawyers for plaintiff Claire Young said the case raises questions about the legal obligations of employers to provide reasonable accommodations for Americans with Disabilities Act Amendments Act-protected groups in the era of COVID-19. Attorney Scott Pollins of Pollins Law, who is co-counsel for Young with David Koller of Koller Law, said that their client's case is about “her desire to work through her challenging medical issues and how her employer thwarted her efforts to do so.” Pollins said the case will also explore whether “remote work was just as much of a reasonable accommodation before the COVID-19 pandemic as it is now.”

On Tuesday, the 2nd Circuit said it had been “presented with a puzzling situation at the end of a vexing chapter” of the parties’ “minor legal epic.” The appeals court vacated Stanton's judgment because it didn't comply with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and defied its order by not addressing summary judgment.
